● NewsSans is a multi-tool typeface system incorporating no fewer than 90 styles. It was designed to allow a maximum range of visual shades when creating a typographic look, effortlessly ranging from loud and expressive, to subtle and reserved. The large x-height combined with low ascenders and descenders allows for tight and efficient designs. All sharp corners were trimmed off to add character and a nuance of extra space. ● NewsSans' strokes link humanist curves with 'American Grotesque' details and solid square stems. The system contains nine weights from hairline to black, and five widths from compressed to extended, each accompanied by a proper italic. ● NewsSans was optimized (hinted) for optimal screen performance.

● Having worked in editorial and brand design for more than a decade, NewsSans designer Henning Skibbe has been responsible for many type-centered projects. Like most designers, he has often paired two contrasting typefaces for a unique look, but every so often it also made sense to limit himself to just one typeface; sometimes just one style.

● NewsSans lets you use a single typeface to create an individual look.

When designing NewsSans, Henning kept balancing the look so that it would never be dull but always legible to the highest degree. Turn the page to read about the character traits of NewsSans.

● No inktraps were used in NewsSans, which means no tilted stem endings appear and the stems finish in square angles. Consequently, the typeface has a sturdy and strong look, nicely countered by the loose and lively humanistic curves.

● All outward pointed corners were removed across the typeface. This becomes more visible in the heavier weights and is almost invisible in the hairline weight. These cuts open up space between letters while at the same time creating spaces within a glyph.

In compressed and normal widths, the descender of »j« spans all the way beneath the previous letter. In the black extended styles, however, the »j«-descender were shortened so as not to collide with the previous letter.

The stroke of the dollar sign only works in lighter weights, and is replaced by two small lines in heavier weights.

The bowls stroke by contrast is almost mono-linear from hairline through regular. Yet in the heavier weights, the horizontal parts of the bowl become lighter and the contrast increases to accommodate space for the counters.

The dot of the »i« changes from a vertical form in the hairline styles to a square in the regular weight and to a horizontal rectangle in the black style.

● hand drawn masters

● NewsSans was planned and designed as an extensive type system to allow for as much variety and flexibility as possible in any given typographic context. In total, 18 masters were hand-drawn to achieve the style bandwidth, from compressed to extended and hairline to black. The additional middle (Regular) masters made it possible to control contrast and design features throughout all styles.
